English use, and still later in Sc. writers, appears to be merely a variety of spelling (of course after the L.); but it is possible that in the few English 16th c. uses of this form, which seem to be confined to immaterial senses, the writers intended the word to be taken as a direct adaptation of the Latin, with the c pronounced.

fude, obs. form of FEUD sb.[1], FOOD.

fudge (fʌdʒ), int. and sb. [Origin obscure.

The int. as used by Goldsmith (quot. 1766) seems from the context merely to represent an inarticulate expression of indignant disgust, though later writers who adopted it from him use it with a more definite meaning. The sb. appears to have been developed partly from the int., and partly from FUDGE v. The etymology suggested in the annexed quot. 1700 can hardly be correct, though Captain Fudge, 'by some called Lying Fudge', (Letter of 1664 in Crouch Posthuma Christiana 1712, p. 87) was a real person (the surname is still common in Dorset). The nautical phrase 'You fudge it', associated in 1700 with the name of the mendacious captain, prob. belongs to FUDGE v. 1. In a dialogue of 1702, 'The Present Condition of the English Navy', one of the interlocutors is called 'Young Fudg of the Admiralty', perh. with allusion to the same verb.

1700 Remarks on the Navy in D'Israeli Cur. Lit., Neology (1841), There was, sir, in our time one Captain Fudge .. who .. always brought home his owners a good cargo of lies, so much that now aboard ship the sailors, when they hear a great lie told, cry out, 'You fudge it'.]

HARMSWORTH et al. Motors xii. 243 Instead of the combustible or fuel being burned..in the cylinder of the engine, as in the internal combustion engine of the petrol car, it is burned under a boiler. c 1915 Autocar Handbk. (ed. 6) iii. 61 The function of the carburetter is to convert the liquid fuel (petrol in most cases) into a gas. 1918 V. -fuge (fju:dʒ), suffix, occurring in words (adj. and sb.) f. mod.L. types in -fugus. According to classical L. analogy, this ending should be connected with fugĕre to flee (cf. profugus), and should have the sense 'fleeing from' (cf. lucifugus, erifuga). In the medical words febrifugus, lit. driving away fevers, vermifugus expelling worms, however, the ending derives its sense from L. fugāre, to put to flight. In imitation of the anglicized forms of these, nonce-wds. in -fuge have occasionally been formed; chiefly on Lat. stems, as DEMONIFUGE (q.v.), dolorifuge, something to drive away pain; but occasionally on Eng. words, as mendacity-fuge.

ful, obs. form of FOUL.

-ful, suffix, originally identical with FULL a.

1. Forming adjs. In OE. the adj. full, like its equivalent in the other Teut. langs., was used in composition with a preceding sb., forming adjs., the etymological sense of which (= 'full of...') is usually somewhat weakened, so that the words may be rendered 'having', 'characterized by' (the attribute denoted by the sb.); the meaning of the suffix thus differs little from that of L. -ōsus, -OUS. In ME. and in mod.E. many new formations of this type have arisen, some of them from Romanic sbs., as beautiful, graceful; and the suffix is still to some extent productive. In the 14th c. a few new forms arose in which the suffix had the force of 'possessing the qualities of'; e.g. masterful, manful. In OE. -full was not ordinarily appended to adjs.; an instance occurs in deorcfull, DARKFUL, used to render L. tenebrosus, and prob. formed in imitation of it. In the 16th and 17th c. a few new words appear f. adjs. or L. adj. stems + -ful, e.g. direful, grateful, tristful, fierceful; prob. these were due to the analogy of older synonyms having this suffix, though it is possible that they may have been in part suggested by It. words like gratevole (gradevole), the ending of which has an accidental resemblance to the Eng. suffix. As the sbs. to which -ful is appended are often nouns of action or state coincident in form with the stems of related vbs., it happens frequently that a word really f. a sb. + -ful is associated in ordinary apprehension rather with the vb. than the sb. (For this there are sometimes special causes; e.g. the sb. thank being obsolete in the sing. while thank vb. is current, the adj. thankful is naturally viewed as a derivative of the latter.) Hence in mod.Eng. adjs. in -ful are sometimes formed directly on verb-stems, the sense of the suffix being 'apt to', 'able or accustomed to', as in assistful, distractful, crossful, mournful; an example of a passive sense (= -able) occurs in bashful.

2. Forming sbs. In the Teut. langs. the form of expression in which a sb. denoting a receptacle is followed by the adj. FULL in concord with it and governing a genitive (e.g. 'a hand full of corn') was used, not only in its proper sense, but in the transferred sense of 'the quantity that fills or would fill' (the receptacle): see FULL a. 1 b. The ambiguity thus arising is partly obviated by a differentiation of form; the sb. and adj. are treated as independent words when they retain their proper sense, but as forming a compound when the sense is transferred. This differentiation has not been carried out to an equal extent in the various langs. In Ger., handvoll 'handful', mundvoll 'mouthful' are written as single words, but this makes no real difference in their syntactical value; the gender of the quasi-compound is determined by that of its first element, and there is no inflexion. In OE. the development had proceeded a step further in the case of handfull, which, although retaining the fem. gender of hand, was so completely one word as to be declinable (accus. -fulle, pl. -fulla, after the prevailing declension of feminines); in the 14th c. the pl. was handfullis. No other compound of this class is found in OE.; commonly the notion was expressed in the original Teut. manner by the adj. full in concord with the sb. This continued also in ME.; but owing to the practice of using the sing. of a noun of quantity instead of the pl. after a numeral, there is seldom any evidence to show whether the ME. antecedent of a word like dishful is to be regarded as a syntactical combination or as a single word. In mod.Eng. -ful has become a suffix forming derivatives with the general sense 'quantity that fills or would fill' (something), and may be attached at pleasure to any sb. denoting an object that can be regarded as holding or containing a more or less definite quantity of anything; thus we have not only bottleful, boxful, canful, spoonful, etc., but bookful, churchful, houseful, worldful, etc. The plural forms spoonsful, cupsful, etc., which are still sometimes heard, represent either a survival of, or (much more probably) a return to, the older grammatical view; but though they have thus some appearance of historical justification, they are contrary to good modern usage, and are objectionable on account of their ambiguity.

The ON. -fyllr (handfyllr handful, munnfyllr mouthful, etc.) is not identical with the Eng. suffix, but is the sb. fyllr fem. = FILL sb.[1], and the compounds are therefore all fem., whatever the gender of the first element.

6. Math. A variable quantity regarded in its relation to one or more other variables in terms of which it may be expressed, or on the value of which its own value depends; function space, a topological space the elements of which are functions.

[This use of the L. functio is due to Leibnitz and his associates. A paper in the Acta Eruditorum for 1692, pp. 169–170, signed 'O.V.E.', but prob. written by Leibnitz, uses functiones in a sense hardly different from its ordinary untechnical sense, to denote the various 'offices' which a straight line may fulfil in relation to a curve, viz. its tangent, normal, etc. In the same journal for 1694, p. 316, Leibnitz defines functio as 'a part of a straight line which is cut off by straight lines drawn solely by means of a fixed point, and of a point in the curve which is given together with its degree of curvature'; the examples given being the ordinate, abscissa, tangent, normal, etc. As the functiones (in Leibnitz' sense) of a curve are variable quantities having a fixed mutual relation, this use of the word easily developed into the modern sense, which occurs in the writings of the Bernoullis early in the 18th c. A somewhat peculiar use occurs about 1713, in Leibnitz' Hist. et Origo Calc. Diff. (Math. Schriften ed. Gerhardt V. 408), where he says that just as constant quantities have their 'functions' , viz. powers and roots, so variables have also 'functions' of a third kind, viz. differentials.]

CLARK Home Trade 198 Foremen are of the type termed 'functional'.

c. As related to the arts, esp. to architecture: designating work executed with a view to its utilitarian purpose; also, of artists, builders, etc.: concerned with the use intended for their product, not with traditional or other theories of design.

c. Social Sciences. Of or pertaining to a particular mental or social function. Applied to an approach to the study of the interrelations of particular phenomena within a given framework or structure, freq. in contrast to a structural approach.

1884 W. E. EVANS-PRITCHARD Social Anthropol. iii. 56 Functional anthropology, with its emphasis on the concept of social system and hence on the need for systematic studies of the social life of primitive peoples as they are today,..not only separated..social anthropology from ethnology; it also brought together the theoretical study of institutions and the observational study of primitive social life. 1968 *Encycl. d. Pertaining to or serving a function (opp. functionless). Also, practical, utilitarian.

'functionalism. [f. FUNCTIONAL a. + -ISM.]

1. Social Sciences. The method of studying, or the theory of, the functional interactions and adaptations of particular phenomena within a given framework or structure.

1914 J. B. WATSON Behavior i. 9 We advance the view that behaviorism is the only consistent and logical functionalism. 1932 Encycl. Social Sci. VI. 524/1 The reason is probably the fact that the whole trend of the social process since Darwin has been in the direction of functionalism and might be described as its verification and validation. 1933 P. RADIN Method & Theory Ethnol. vi. 176 Why a new term like functionalism should be applied to it is not at all evident. 1937 R. H. LOWIE Hist. Ethnol. Theory xiii. 235 Malinowski's functionalism is avowedly antidistributional, antihistorical, and treats each culture as a closed system except insofar as its elements correspond to vital biological urges. 1944 B. MALINOWSKI Sci. Theory of Culture x. 117 The type of criticism levelled against functionalism, to the effect that it never can prove why a specific form..of table implement or theological concept, is prevalent in a culture, derives from the prescientific craving for first causes. 1951 R. B. MACLEOD in Rohrer & Sherif Social Psychol. at Crossroads 224 Functionalism..has settled down to the 'middle of the road' American psychology. 1956 J. H. M. BEATTIE in A. JACOBSON tr. Lévi-Strauss's Struct. Anthropol. v. xv. 290 Therefore, historico-geographical concerns should not be excluded from the field of structural studies, as was generally implied by the widely accepted opposition between 'diffusionism' and 'functionalism'.

2. Regard for the function and purpose of a building as regulating its shape and style. Also in extended use.

1930 Observer 29 June 20 Sugar-cube architecture, or to be impressively abstract 'Functionalism'. Ibid. 5 Oct. 19 This is what is called the architecture of functionalism. The architectural form arises purely out of the purpose of the building. 1935 Fortnightly Apr. 410 We are now told that 'Functionalism' is the one and only test of art. 1941 Burlington Mag. Feb. 66/2 His definition of modern 'Functionalism' will not satisfy all readers, though it will make many of them chuckle: 'The theory that any building which could be made to stand up at all was All Right.' 1955 S. SPENDER Making of Poem i. 18 Functionalism is the philistinism of people who talk about a work of art as a 'well-done job' like any other piece of plumbing. 1957 E. H. GOMBRICH Story of Art xxvii. 421 The theories for which the Bauhaus stood are sometimes condensed in the slogan of 'functionalism'—the belief that if something is only designed to fit its purpose we can let beauty look after itself.

'functionalist, sb. (and a.) [f. FUNCTIONAL a. + -IST.]

1. Social Sciences. An adherent or advocate of the functional approach (see FUNCTIONAL a. 2 c). Also attrib. or as adj.

B. MACLEOD in Rohrer & Sherif Social Psychol. at Crossroads 224 For the functionalist perceiving is also a function, one of the organism's ways of adjusting itself. 1952 W. J. H. SPROTT Social Psychol. 221 The 'Functionalists' —such as Malinowski and Radcliffe-Brown—come to our aid. At least every society must provide means of satisfying the basic needs of its members, and we can therefore explain many of their institutions in terms of the function they perform to this end. 1961 *Oxf. 2. An adherent of functionalism in design. Also attrib. or as adj., exhibiting functionalism.

1932 H. ROBERTSON *Mod. Archit. functionate ('fʌŋkʃəneɪt), v. Somewhat rare. [f. as prec. + -ATE[3].] intr. To perform one's function; to work, operate; to officiate. Hence 'functionating vbl. sb., in quot. attrib.

1856 LEVER Martins of Cro' M. 149 The worst of the class is, they'll only functionate for your grand dinners, and they leave your every-day meal to some inferior in the department. 1869 Daily News 11 June, The reflective faculty remains in undisturbed repose. functor ('fʌŋktə(r)). [f. FUNCT(ION sb. + -OR, after type factor.] 1. Logic. A function or operator.

1937 A. SMEATON tr. Carnap's Logical Syntax Lang. §3. p. 14 In order to express properties or relations of position by means of numbers, we shall use functors. Ibid., Besides such descriptive functors, we make use also of logical functors. For example: 'sum (3, 4)' has the meaning: '3 plus 4'. 1947 H. REICHENBACH Elem. Symb. Logic §54. p. 312 Among the functors, the unique mathematical functions are of particular importance. 1951 J. ŁUKASIEWICZ Aristotle's Syllogistic iv. 78 The principle of my notation is to write the functors before the arguments. In this way I can avoid brackets. 1956 E. H. HUTTEN Lang. Mod. Physics vi. 232 Newton's first law..finds a 'natural' translation as, e.g. (x)(Rx v Ux ⊃ ~ Fx), if the functors R, U, and F mean 'being at rest', 'being in uniform motion', and 'being acted upon by a force', respectively. 1963 Med. Ævum XXXII. 144 One should have 'can exist of itself'; this modal functor ..is vital to the course of the..exposition.

2. Linguistics. = form-word; also used more widely, to include similar affixes, etc.

1958 C. F. HOCKETT Course in Mod. Ling. xxxi. 264 There are at least three types of grammatical forms which are to be classed as functors. 1964 R. A. HALL Introd. Ling. iii. 15 These elements which indicate grammatical functions are termed 'function-words' or 'functors'. 1965 Listener 17 June 903/2 In themselves prepostions (which may be described as structure-words or functors) have no lexical meanings. 1967 R. A. WALDRON Sense & Sense Devel. ii. 45 Even individual words like and, but, or,..(which are variously known as function words, form words, operators, functors, or kenemes)..are defined grammatically rather than, or as well as, lexically.

1951 J. ŁUKASIEWICZ Aristotle's Syllogistic v. 132 All these may be called functorial propositions, since in all of them there occurs a propositional functor, like 'if—then', 'or', 'and'. 1955 A. 1. Originally, the length of the furrow in the common field, which was theoretically regarded as a square containing ten acres. As a lineal measure, the furlong therefore varied according to the extent assigned at various times and places to the ACRE, but was usually understood to be equal to 40 poles (rods, perches). As early as the 9th c. it was regarded as the equivalent of the Roman stadium, which was ⅛ of a Roman mile; and hence furlong has always been used as a name for the eighth part of an English mile, whether this coincided with the agricultural measure so called or not. The present statute furlong is 220 yards, and is equal both to the eighth part of a statute mile, and to the side of a square of 10 statute acres.

1906 H. W. & F. G. FOWLER King's Eng. ii. 119 The mistake is caused by certain types of sentence in which a real, not a fused participle is so used that the noun and its (unfused) participle give a sense hardly distinguishable from a possessive noun and a gerund. Ibid. 120 Long fused-participle phrases are a variety of abstract expression, and as such to be deprecated. 1926 FOWLER Mod. Eng. Usage 205/2 Fused participle is a name given to the construction exemplified in its simplest form by 'I like you pleading poverty'... The name was invented..for the purpose of labelling & so making recognizable & avoidable a usage considered by the inventor to be rapidly corrupting modern English style. 1942 PARTRIDGE Usage & Abusage 124/2 Idiomatically, the excuse me doing form is generally understood to be positive; but it is much rarer than the excuse my doing form, especially since ca. 1920, when the fused participle doctrine began to ravage the land. 1954 E. GOWERS Compl. Ploin Words ix. 157 What they are not agreed about is whether it is also correct to..write 'the Bill getting a second reading surprised everyone'. If that is a legitimate grammatical construction, the subject of the sentence, which cannot be Bill by itself, or getting by itself, must be a fusion of the two. Hence the name 'fused participle'.

fy, obs. form of FIE.

fy-: see also FI-.

-fy (faɪ), suffix, forming verbs. The older Eng. vbs. in -fy are adoptions of Fr. vbs in -fier, which are either adapted from Lat. vbs. in -ficāre or formed on the analogy of vbs. so originating. (The form -fier was used as the representative of L. -ficāre on the analogy of words like saintefier:—sanctificāre.) The Lat. vbs. in -ficāre were originally derivatives of adjs. in -fic-us (see -FIC), though subsequently the suffix could be used to form vbs. without the intervention of an adj. They may be divided into three classes (corresponding to three classes of adjectives in -ficus: see -FIC), all of which are represented by adapted words in Eng.: (1) vbs. f. sbs., with the sense 'to make, produce', as pācificāre (orig. intr. to make peace) pacify, ædificāre edify, or 'to make or convert into something', as deificāre deify; (2) f. adjs., with the sense 'to bring into a certain state', as santificāre sanctify; (3) f. vb.-stems, with causative sense, as horrificāre horrify. In med.L. there was a tendency to substitute -ficāre for -facĕre in the few Lat. vbs. so ending, and hence Fr. and Eng. vbs. in -fier, -fy sometimes correspond to Lat. vbs. in -facĕre; e.g. F. stupéfier (but in pa. pple. stupéfait as well as stupéfié) stupefy, OF. satisfier (but mod.F. satisfaire) satisfy, F. liquéfier liquefy, F. rubéfier rubefy, med.L. caleficare calefy. Exc. in the case of these few vbs. the ending has normally the form -ify (for the reason see -FIC). It is now used as the regular rendering of -ficāre in new words adopted from Lat. or formed on assumable Lat. types, and is also freely added to Eng. adjs. and sbs. to form vbs., mostly somewhat jocular or trivial, with the senses: 'to make a specified thing', as speechify; 'to assimilate to the character of something' (chiefly in pa. pple., as countrified); 'to invest with certain attributes', as Frenchify. (A large proportion of these vbs are from sbs. and adjs. ending in -y or -ey, the suffix then having the form -fy instead of the usual -ify. An early example is beautify, but the analogy on which this word was formed is not clear.) In a few cases the suffix has been quite irregularly added to vb. stems, but the words are either obsolete, as dedify, hindrify, ornify, or merely jocular or illiterate, as argufy. The noun of action related to vbs. in -ify normally ends in -ification, though, by confusion of suffix, petrifaction is used in Eng. where Fr. has more correctly pétrification. The words in which -fy represents L. -facĕre having their corresponding nouns of action ending in -faction.

The following examples illustrate the freedom with which this suffix has been used in the formation of nonce-words.

fylfot ('filfɒt). [The sole authority on which this word has been accepted by modern antiquaries as the name of the mark in question is the passage from the Lansdowne MS. quoted below. The context in which the word there occurs seems to favour the supposition that it is simply fill-foot, meaning a pattern or device for 'filling the foot' of a painted window. There is nothing to show whether the word denoted specifically this device as distinguished from others used for the same purpose, and it is even possible that it may have been a mere nonce-word.] A name for the figure called also a cross cramponnee (see CRAMPONNEE), and identical with the SWASTIKA of India, the gammadion of Byzantine ecclesiastical ornament; it has been extensively used as a decoration (often, apparently, as a mystical symbol) in almost all known parts of the world from prehistoric times to the present day. G

G (dʒi:), the seventh letter of the Roman alphabet, was originally a differentiated form of C; for its early history see that letter. In Latin G represented the voiced guttural stop; but in the later period of the language it must have been pronounced before front vowels as a palatal, its representation in the Rom. langs. being precisely the same as that of Lat. I consonant (J); hence in OF. G before e, i was pronounced like J, viz. as the assibilated (dʒ).

In OE. the letter stood for four different sounds, viz. the voiced guttural and palatal stop (in this Dictionary represented by g, g), and the voiced guttural and palatal spirant (here printed ɣ, ʒ). The precise distribution of these sounds is much disputed, but if we confine our view to the very end of the OE. period the following statements may be made. Initial G before back vowels was a guttural stop (g), developed from an earlier spirant. Initial G before front vowels was a palatal spirant (j). Medially and finally, G represented a guttural or a palatal, according to the nature of the associated sounds; in the combinations ng and gg (written cg when palatal, rarely when guttural) it was a stop, and in other positions a spirant. In early ME., or perh. in late OE., the palatal stop developed into the complex sound (dʒ), thus coinciding with the power of G before e, i, in contemporary French.

In early ME. the continental form of G (approximately ɡ) was used for the two sounds which the letter had in French, (g) and (dʒ), while the OE. form ȝ was used for the sounds peculiar to native words, viz. the guttural and palatal spirants (ɣ, j). Ormin attempted to differentiate the symbol ɡ into two, ɡ = (dʒ), and ɣ = (g); but his example was not followed. The symbol ȝ gradually came to assume a form indistinguishable from that used for Z in contemporary MSS.; in this Dictionary the form ȝ is employed for ME. words. This symbol was commonly used in ME. for the sound of (j) initial and final, for the guttural and palatal unvoiced spirant final or before t (as in inouȝ, auȝt, niȝt, OE. ȝenóh, áht, niht), and, so long as the sound remained in the language, for the guttural voiced spirant. From the 13th c., however, the ȝ was by some scribes wholly or partially discarded for y or gh; a few texts have yh. In the 15th c. vocabularies the words beginning with ȝ are at the end of the alphabet. Caxton uses the symbol sparingly, chiefly before final t. The English printers of the 16th c. scarcely use it at all; but in Scotland it survived longer, and has left a trace in the use of z for y in the spelling of surnames like Menzies and Dalziel, and of such words as capercailzie, gaberlunzie.

In modern English G has the so-called 'hard' sound (g) at the end of a word, before a consonant or a, o, u, (exc. in gaol, gaoler), and in words of Teutonic etymology before e and i, as in give, get; also in Hebrew proper names, as Gedaliah, Gideon. In words from Lat. or Romanic it has the 'soft' sound (dʒ) before e, i, y; and at the end of a syllable, in words of whatever origin, the sound (dʒ) is represented always by dge or ge, the letter J not being used in this position. The combination gn is sounded n initially or at the end of a syllable. When the combination ng occurs in one syllable, the g is now silent, serving only to give to the n the value of (ŋ). With regard to the pronunciation of ng in the middle of a disyllable, modern usage is somewhat inconsistent: in the inflexions and derivatives of verbs the g is silent, as in singer, singeth, singing ('sɪŋə(r), 'sɪŋɪθ, 'sɪŋɪŋ), but is sounded in the comparatives and superlatives of adjs., as in younger, longer ('jʌŋgə(r), 'lɒŋgə(r)), and the other words generally, as finger ('fɪŋgə(r)).

The combination gh is in a few words (aghast, ghastly, ghost) a mere capricious substitute for g (cf. Caxton's frequent ghoos, ghoot, gherle = goose, goat, girl). Elsewhere it chiefly represents the older guttural or palatal spirant (OE. ȝ or h), which in modern pronunciation is either dropped, as in high, night, through, plough, or replaced by (f), as in laugh, rough, tough; a special development has taken place in hough (hɒk).

II. Used as a symbol, with reference to its place (7th) in the alphabet

1. G, g, g is used to denote anything occupying the seventh place in a series. (Cf. A, B, C, etc.)

2. In Music G is the name of the 5th note of the diatonic scale of C major; called G in Germany, sol in France and Italy. Also the scale or key which has that note for its tonic. G clef: the treble clef (see CLEF[1]) placed on the line in the stave appropriated to the note G.

gab (gæb), v.[1] Forms: 2–4 gabbe-n, 4–6 gabb(e, (5 gabe), 3– gab. [app. a. OF. gab(b)er (also written gauber, gaiber, once, perh. erroneously, jaber), to mock, deride, jest; the word is found (perh. as an adoption from OFr.) as Pr. and OSp. gabar, It. gabbare, to mock, jest, Pg. gabar to praise, refl. to boast. Cf. the related GAB sb.[1] Moat etymologists regard the Rom. vb. and sb. as adoptions of the Teut. words which appear as ON. gabba to mock, gabb mockery (GAB sb.[1]), OFris. gabbia to accuse, prosecute (cf. sense 1 below), MDu. and MLG. gabben to mock, deceive. But in words of early adoption, Teut. ga- normally became ja- in Central French; further, the occurrence of bb in Teut. words (apart from hypocoristic and onomatopœic formations and WGer. bb from bj) is rare and etymologically obscure; and the chronology of the varioua Teut. forms would not forbid the supposition that they were all adopted from OFr. If the words be either Teut. or Rom. formationa from a Teutonic root, they may perhaps be connected ultimately with GAPE v.; cf. the Icel. use of gap in the sense of clamour, jeers; on the other hand they may be onomatopœic formations expressing the notion of loud outcry, chatter; cf. gable ('geɪb(ə)l), sb.[1] Forms: a. Sc. and north. 4–9 gavel(l, 4–6 gavyll, 5 gavul, gawill, 4, 7 gavil(l. β. 5 gabyl, gabul, 7–8 gabel(l, 4– gable. [The northern form gavel (still in Scotland pron. 'gev(ə)l) is perh. directly a. ON. gafl masc., of the same meaning (Sw. gafvel, Da. gavl). The southern form gable might be a dial. variant of this (cf. nable for navel), but is more prob. a. OF. gable, jable masc., which is not found in other Rom. langs., and is prob. a. ON. gafl.

The corresponding words in the other Teut. langs. (OTeut. types gablâ, -ljâ*) have the sense of 'fork': so OE. ʒ(e)afol, OS. gaflia (Gallée OS. Texts 157), MDu. gaffel(e (Du. gaffel), OHG. gabala (MHG., mod.G. gabel) fem.; app. cognate are OIr. gabul, gobul, Welsh gafl, fork (of the body, of a branch); the L. gabalus, app. meaning some kind of gallows or cross, is by some supposed to be lit. 'fork', and to have been adopted from Teut. or Celtic. In Goth. and WGer. the sense 'gable' is expressed by words that appear to be related by ablaut to the word for 'fork'; Goth. gibla wk. masc. πτερυγίον, 'pinnacle' of the temple, MDu. ghevel (Du. gevel), OHG. gibil (mod.G. giebel) masc. With different sense, but agreeing in root, grade, and suffix, are OHG. gebal head, gibilla crown of the head, app. cognate with Gr. κεφαλή head (OAr. root ghebh*). Possibly the primitive meaning of the words may have been 'top', 'vertex'; this may have given rise to the sense of 'gable', and this latter to the sense of 'fork', a gable being originally formed by two pieces of timber crossed at the top supporting the end of the roof-tree (see FORK sb. 7).]

1719 RAMSAY 2nd Answ. Hamilton iii, It sets ye well indeed to gadge! Ibid. Gloss., Gadge, to dictate impertinently, talk idly with a stupid gravity.

gadge, obs. f. GAGE sb.[1] and Sc. f. GAUGE.

gadget ('gædʒɪt). Also formerly gadjet. [Origin obscure. First known in use among seafaring men, and said by several correspondents to have been current c 1870, and by a few as far back as the fifties of the nineteenth century, but not found in print before 1886.

One of the most plausible etymological suggestions is F. gâchette, which is or has been applied to various pieces of mechanism, e.g. in a lock and in a gun; it is a dim. of gâche staple (of a lock), wall-staple or hook. The possibility of connexion with F. engager to engage (one thing with another) has also been suggested; cf. dial. F. gagée tool, instrument. Derivation from GAUGE is improbable.]

Used as an indefinite or general name for: a comparatively small fitting, contrivance, or piece of mechanism.

F. gagner (earlier spelling gaigner):—OF. gaaignier = Pr. gazanhar, OSp. guadañar (to mow), It. guadagnare:—Com. Rom. gwadaniare*, ad. OHG. weidinjan* (recorded form weidenen), used in two main senses (1) to graze, pasture, (2) to go in quest of fodder or food, to forage, hunt or fish, f. weida str. fem., fodder or food, pasture, pursuit of fodder or food, hunting (mod.Ger. weide pasture, pasturage), corresp. to OE. wáð, ON. veið-r hunting:—OTeut. waipâ*, -þjâ. The twofold sense of the OHG. verb seems to be reflected in the Rom. form, which was used for 'to cultivate land' (so in OFr.; see GAIN v.[3], GAINAGE, GAINOR), as well as for 'to gain, win, earn'; the latter sense, which the word retains in mod.Fr. and It., may be in part developed from the OHG. sense 'to hunt'.]

℗ In the following passage the word is a literal rendering of the Gr. κερδαίνειν. The sense of the original is disputed; most scholars, regarding the clause as qualified by the foregoing negative, take the verb as having, with or without a touch of irony, the extended sense 'to obtain whatever good or bad' (Johnson, s.v. Gain); so Liddell and Scott, also Revised Version ('gotten'). Others assign to the Gr. vb. the sense 'to spare oneself, avoid, save'; so De Wette, Alford, Blass, and others. Both uses of the vb. occur in Gr. writers; it is not at all clear which view was taken by the translators, or whether they deliberately adopted an ambiguous rendering.

gale (geil), sb.[3] Also 6–7 gaile, gayle, (? 7 gall). [Of obscure origin.

Possibly elliptical for gale (or gall) wind (see quot. 1619 in 3) where gale may have been originally an adj. Some scholars suppose that the word is in some way connected with Da. gal, Norw. galen (neut. galet), mad, furious, bad (often said of weather), ON. galenn, mad, frantic (? lit. enchanted, bewitched), pa. pple. of gala, to sing. The spelling and rimes in the earliest quot., however, seem to disprove this.]

1. a. A wind of considerable strength; in nautical language, the word chiefly 'implies what on shore is called a storm' (Adm Smyth), esp. in the phrases strong, hard gale (a stiff gale is less violent, a fresh gale still less so); in popular literary use, 'a wind not tempestuous, but stronger than a breeze' (J.). Also gale of wind. In restricted use, applied to a wind having a velocity within certain limits (see quots.). equinoctial gale (see EQUINOCTIAL 2 b).

gall (gɔ:l), sb.[2] Forms: 1 ȝealla, 4-6 galle, 4-7 gaule, 7 gal, 6-9 Sc. gaw, 6- gall. [OE. ȝealla wk. masc., a sore on a horse, corresponds in meaning to MSw. galle wk. masc., MLG., MHG., mod.G. galle fem., Du. gal fem.; in Ger. and Du. the word has or has had (see Grimm Wb. and the Nederl. Woordenb.) the senses 'pimple or blister generally, barren spot in a field, flaw or rotten place in a rock', etc. All these words are in the several langs. formally identical with those repr. GALL sb.[1], and it seems not unlikely that they may be actually identical; the notion of 'venom' (GALL sb.[1] 5) passes easily into that of 'envenomed sore' (cf. FELON sb.[2]); the other senses illustrated below may be explained as referring to the gall as a part of the carcass which has to be removed as useless and offensive. The ON. and MSw. galle wk. masc., 'fault, defect' (in phrases equivalent to 'without gall'), seems to admit of the same explanation.

It is, however, probable that words of different etymology have influenced the sense-development in the Eng. and other Teut. langs. In the Rom. langs. the word for GALL sb.[3] (F. galle, It. gala, Sp. agalla) was used for a swelling on the fetlock of a horse (= Ger. floszgalle, windgalle, Eng. WINDGALL), and Ger. writers of the 16th c. argue that the word ought, being a transferred use of galle gall-nut, to be limited to this specific meaning. In Eng. the word seems to have been influenced (through GALL v.) by OF. galler, galer to rub, scratch, gall: possibly also by F. gale fem., itch, scurf, scab (also, flaw in cloth, whence Du. gaal); the source of these words is unknown, one suggestion being that they are derived from L. galla GALL sb.[3]]

1. Originally, a painful swelling, pustule, or blister, esp. in a horse (cf. WINDGALL). In later use (? influenced by GALL v.), a sore or wound produced by rubbing or chafing.

gallant ('gælənt, gə'lænt), a. and sb. Forms: 4–6 galaunt(e, 5–8 galant(e, 5–6 Sc. galland, 6 gallante, -aunt, -aunde, 6– gallant. [a. F. galant (recorded from the 14th c.), pa. pple of OF. galer to make merry, make a show, (connected with gale merrymaking = It., Sp. gala; see GALE sb.[2] and GALA). The early senses of the adj. in Fr. are: 'dashing, spirited, bold' (obsolete in Fr., but the source of the prevailing sense in mod.Eng.); 'gay in appearance, handsome, gaily attired'; and 'fitted for the pleasures of society, attractive in manners, courteous, polished'. The last of these gave rise in mod.Fr. to the specialized senses 'politely attentive to women', and 'amorous, amatory', which were adopted into Eng. in the 17th c., and are usually distinguished by the accentuation ga'llant. The It. galante, courteous, honourable, and Sp. galante, gaily dressed, sprightly, galan, galano gaily dressed, seemed to have been adopted from French. The use as sb., which is recorded in Eng. somewhat earlier than the adjectival use, was adopted from Fr., in which language all the senses of the sb. had been developed.

The origin of the OFr. verb. galer is disputed. The view of Diez, that it was f. the OHG. geil = ME. GOLE, wanton, is now abandoned, as the normal Central French form on that supposition should begin with j; the form galer (for which waler occurs as a variant) points to an original initial w. Hence most recent scholars regard the vb. as ad. OHG. wallôn to wander, go on pilgrimage; but the transition of sense offers difficulties that are not fully cleared up.]

Now chiefly in pl. Forms: 6 garragascoyne, 6–7 galli-, gally gascoi(g)n(e, -gascoyn(e, (6 galigascon, gallie gascoine, gallo-gascaine, 7 gallgaskin), 7–9 gally-gaskin, (9 galigaskin), 7– galligaskin. [app. an interpretative corruption of the 16th c. F. garguesque, a metathetic var. of greguesque, ad. It. grechesca sb., originally fem. of grechesco Greek (this kind of hose being in 16th c. described as alla grechesca = F. à la grecque in the Greek fashion). The surviving Fr. word in this sense is grègue, ad. Pr. grega or Sp. griega, orig. the fem. of the adj., Pr. grego, Sp. griego, Greek.

The form garragascoynes seems to prove that the Fr. word is really the source. The synonymous gally-breeches, gally-slops (see GALLY a.[1] or sb.) occur earlier than, and gasco(y)n, GASKIN[1], about the same time with, the present word. If they are really older, the perversion of garguesque into galligaskin is fully accounted for. They may, however, have originated in a false analysis of galligaskin, which in that case must have been corrupted from garguesque by the influence of GASCON and GALLEY sb. (less probably L. Galli-, Gallus, GAUL, or gally GALLOWS sb. in the sense 'braces'). The early examples associate galligaskins with 'shipmen's hose', and imply that the fashion belonged to the south of Europe, so that it would be very natural for popular etymology to connect the word with galley.]

gallipot ('gælɪpɒt). Forms: 5 galy pott, gale pote, 6 galey potte, galeye pot, gallie potte, 6–8 gally pot (gally-pot), 7 gollee-, galley-pot, 8 galipot, 7– gallipot. [The first element in this word (occurring also in GALLEY-DISH, GALLEY-TILE) is of uncertain origin, but possibly identical with GALLEY sb.[1], in which case the words etymologically denote pottery such as was brought in galleys, i.e. imported from the Mediterranean. Cf. GALLEY-HALFPENNY.

The Du. synonym gleipot is not recorded till a century later than the date of our earliest examples of the English word, and the editors of the great Dutch dictionary think that its first element may possibly be identical with glei (frequent in the 17th c.), a variant of galei GALLEY sb.[1] In support of this view, it is pointed out that the Du. kraakgoed, kraakporselein mean literally 'porcelain imported in carracks', and a passage is quoted from the Inv. v. Brussel II. 206 which mentions 'glass-wares brought in galleys and carracks' (que les galees et les caraques amenent). Farther, gleyers-werk is explained by Kilian as meaning Balearic or Majorcan pottery (cf. MAJOLICA). On the other hand, the word glei is given in Kilian and Du. dicts. of the 17th c. as a name for porcelain clay; but it has not been found in any text, except in the compound gleybacker, geley backer 'porcelain baker'; and it may have been merely formed by misinterpretation of the compounds gleipot and gleiwerk, gleigoed (glazed pottery).]

The statement, made on etymological grounds by Spenser (State of Irel. 640/1, Globe ed.), that the 'galloglasses' were originally English mercenaries, seems doubtful; gall is used of foreigners or strangers generally, and, although mainly applied to the English in Spenser's day, may not have been so restricted at the time when the compound was formed.]

1. An apparatus for inflicting the punishment of death by hanging, usually consisting of two uprights and a cross-piece, from which the criminal is suspended by the neck. Sometimes used as equivalent to CROSS. See CROSS sb. 1.

In OE. the sing. galȝa and the pl. galȝan are both used for 'a gallows', the pl. having reference presumably to the two posts of which the apparatus mainly consisted. Occasional examples of the sing. form occur in ME., and even down to the 17th c.; but from the 13th c. onwards the plural galwes and its later phonetic representatives have been the prevailing forms. So far as our material shows, Caxton is the first writer to speak of 'a gallows', though he also uses the older expression 'a pair of gallows'; but it is, of course, possible that the pl. form was sometimes treated as a sing. much earlier. From the 16th c. gallows has been (exc. arch. in 'pair of gallows') used as a sing., with a new plural gallowses; the latter, though perh. not strictly obsolete, is now seldom used; the formation is felt to be somewhat uncouth, so that the use of the word in the plural is commonly evaded.
